GALENA, ITS TRADE, &C.

The City of Galena is situated in 42½ degrees North Latitude, on a line with the City of Boston, Mass., and has one of the most varied and healthy locations in the United States. It lies on Galena River, which is little else here than an arm or bay of the Mississippi, and has one of the finest harbors for Steamboats on the latter river. It contained in the month of June last, 9,629 inhabitants—the regular residents only being counted—no allowance being made for visitors and transient population, of which there are always a large number. It is fully within bounds to say, that Galena contains this day, over TEN THOUSAND inhabitants. For two years past, the advance of Galena in population and wealth has been remarkably rapid, and the future promises a still more rapid increase.

It is the commercial centre of the Great Lead Mining region of the Northwest; it has free access by Steamboats to all the navigable waters of the Valley of the Mississippi, above and below, and constant daily communication during the season of navigation. In a few months, Railroad communication will be opened with the East by means of the Illinois Central and the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad. The Chicago, St. Charles and Mississippi Air-Line Railroad, now in course of construction, terminates here; and the Great Northwestern Railroad from Galena up the Valley of the Tete des Morts to the Minnesota River and to St. Paul, is also projected, and recent events give promise of its speedy construction. The amount of business transacted here last year may be judged of by the statistics published for 1853;

the statistics of 1854, as we at present judge, will show a large and gratifying increase.
